

Meredith Morrow-Okon
Honors Application Essay – University of Washington

“Good citizenship comes from good scholarship.” What does this statement mean to you?

In order to be a good citizen, one must be an active and globally aware individual. The good conduct of a first-rate citizen echoes his or her engagement as an involved and curious person intent on continuous learning. This good scholarship, or drive to gain profound academic knowledge, is a key trait of a good citizen because it shows their dedication to bettering themselves through the attainment of knowledge. Only through challenging oneself academically can one hope to gain knowledge about the world around them, past, present, and future. This broadened awareness leads to becoming a good citizen because the involved person is the one with the best conduct.

Furthermore, good citizenship comes from good scholarship because the pursuit of scholarly knowledge teaches individuals how to challenge themselves. Education is a never-ending cycle of gaining both facts and understanding; therefore, a person with good scholarship will be continually challenging themselves to go above and beyond in order to broaden their personal knowledge. Thus, if an individual is adept at challenging themselves in the name of higher learning, they will also be able to challenge themselves to be the best citizen they can be and conduct themselves in an admirable manner.

Essentially, good scholarship leads to good citizenship in two ways: by helping the scholar to gain knowledge about the bigger picture and the world they are a part of, and by challenging said individual to reach their full potential both academically and character-wise. A good academic base and the pursuit of scholarly knowledge inevitably leads to the creation of a better-informed and well-rounded person with an excellent nature and respectable moral fiber, who displays all the commendable characteristics of a good citizen.